Where Rank Didn't Count.

Nowhere are the lines of rank more sharply drawn than in the navy. On board ship Jack never dream of crossing the mark, but off service the personal ego sometimes asserts itself, and did even in the old days. In "Navy Yarns," W. H. Long does an instance of this which happened more than one hundred years ago. On the return of Admiral Rodney the British seamen received their first installment of prize money, amounting to eighty pounds per man.

One of the seamen hired the London stage coach to take the trip to London, with his lady. In those days there were not many public conveyances and Jack took the whole coach to himself and companion. Just as the vehicle was about to start, a naval officer came up and requested the coachman to open the door.

"The coach is full, sir," said the coachman, touching his hat.

"How can that be?" There are only two in it.

"True, your honor. One of the crew of the Magnificent has engaged the coach for himself and party."

"Oh, if that's the case, let me see him, and I'll soon settle the matter," replied the officer, who opened the door and tried to enter. Jack stopped him.

"What ship? Where you steering to?" Don't you know I'm captain of this craft?"

"I know it, Jack," answered his officer. "You must give me a birth of board for London."

"This is my ship," insisted Jack. "and nobody shall come aboard least I say the word."

"Lieutenant Goodwin wants to take a berth in your cabin," interposed the coachman.

"He never axed me into his cabin aboard the Magnificent. Howsoever he may go on the deck if he likes. Hope he'll look out for you and see that you're steady at the helm."

The lieutenant took Jack's reply in good part, mounted to the top of the coach and was told off to London. From the Youth's Companion.
